Now we do not say that the amount thus distr ated is too great or that it is not judiciously sideration more intrinsically valuable could not i such forms as to suggest the one idea only of comthing to drink. To disseminate useful knowledge is the paramount aim of all agricultural and mechanical associations. Would it not be productive of much good if a desire to accumulate a well-nelected library could be substituted for that of acquiring a collection of useless cups and pitchers: Could not this be done by these societies, if not at once, at least by slow degrees, by annually inter-spersing valuable books and periodicals in lieu of the plate, giving single books or small libraries treating on the subject for which the premium is offered. Such books as are published by Saxton & Co. alone would afford quite a range of premiums,

Co. alone would afford quite a range of premiums, and the leading agricultural paper of the State for the periodical; the Scientific American as the periodical for the mechanic, to which add valuable books on mechanics for the larger premiums.

In this way, it seems to us, a taste for reading would be encouraged by the different societies, instead of a taste for nucleus extravagance, as under the present system.

We know that such an immovation would be discouraged by many at first, and in many cases the very men whose better judgment tells them that they or their children need just such information as they or their children need just such information as the constant of the con these papers and tooks contain would still contend for the "plate premium."
